

ARCHAEOLOGY FIELD SCHOOL

June 18 - July 29, 2011

In partnership with the Anthropology Department at Hamilton College (New York), Selkirk College offers an exciting opportunity for a few of our exceptional students to enroll in Archaeology Field School to be held at the Slocan Narrows Pithouse Village in southeastern British Columbia. The course runs for six weeks during June and July.

The field school trains students in excavation, survey, equipment used in mapping, as well as the archaeology, ethnography, and oral tradition of the interior Pacific Northwest. Upon the completion of this course, students are eligible to be employed in the field of archaeology.

This is a field methods class held in a remote location, requiring students to learn to live and work together as a group while they learn field methods and contribute to the success of a long-term archaeological research project. All students are expected to do their share of camp chores as part of their participation in this class.
